Summary: The fourth element of a digital classroom is the most iconic: the technology. Whether hardware or software, WiFi or LANs, operating systems or social media channels, the technology of a digital classroom is the most visible part for many, and thus can seem the most crucial. (This, of course, couldn't be further from the truth.

The latter ships with Windows 10 Pro, rather than Windows 10 Home, and a preview of a 40-lesson coding curriculum built around Kano's Software Studio. The hope, presumably, is that schools will buy the PC in bulk — or enough for a single class, at least — and slowly deliver the entire curriculum to pupils.
